I think it best that Bill and I come in, here your concerns at a macro level, even if we don't go through the draft line by line.

Remember, we also want to go over the notes that you have already reviewed -- so that we can see what you took out (which we do not know at the moment).

Thanks.

Given PRB's response is extensive, you or Bill may just want to pick it up tomorrow, take some time to discuss it, and then respond or re-engage with a more targeted discussion another day.

Thanks.

Look forward to starting the dialogue. What room should we come to?

We will by that time have completed and will present to you PRB's formal and coordinated response from our review of your manuscript and will be prepared to broadly address any initial concerns or issues at that time. Once you've had sufficient time to review, you can then submit edits in writing or a request for reconsideration. We are also willing to engage in-person in the future, but are not prepared for a "line-by-line" or other extensively detailed type of interaction Wednesday. Let me know if you have any questions. Please confirm that you and Mr. Harlow maintain ready entry access or if our assistance is needed.

>> Thanks for the conversation earlier this week. After thinking about it, though, I believe it is important that we start the process of going through your requested changes -- even though you still have some outstanding pieces. Let's get going with the chapters that are done. We need to do this because I have a contractual obligation to the publisher, and I am getting worried about my ability to meet that obligation if this drags on for several more weeks. And, we are now five days beyond when I asked that the manuscript be completed -- a deadline that I was told the Agency would be able to meet.

There will be issues that we all will be able to resolve and perhaps some issues we identify that will require a meeting with Meroe in order to resolve (which is another reason to get going because I know how difficult it will be to find a time on her schedule).
